

Trends Shaping Sustainability in Land Use in the Coming Decade

Tuesday, Dec 11, 11:30am - 1:30pm, Hawaii Prince Hotel

Join the Urban Land Institute's Jim Heid in a discussion on "What's Next in Sustainability." Local experts will join the dialog to highlight the potentials and pitfalls in Hawaii of the latest in sustainability thinking.

- Regional Collaboration - communities will need to work together to maximize efficient use of decreasing resources, economic competitiveness and ensure unique places
- Private/Public/ Private Partnerships - how things will get done in 2015
- Financing Green Retrofit - Its harder than you think....but there is hope
- More Information and Complexity - static certifications move to measurement of dynamic performance & will require a new landscape of frequent metrics
- Eco-districts in the urban core - lessons from greenfield development will drive urban regeneration at scale
- Greater market understanding - more information does not automatically result in more understanding, greater market sophistication is required.
- Food - why eats are the key to creating local culture, sense of place, improving health and security
- Sharing everything - cars, bikes, offices, housing – why owning may no longer be cool
- The Squishy Stuff - is culture, happiness, spirituality and well being the new frontier of sustainability?

Urban Core Eco Districts

The Lloyd Crossing Sustainable Urban Design Plan in Portland, OR, looks at an urban ecosystem in which individual properties and the neighborhood public realm function together as an environmentally low-impact unit with high economic potential.

Keynote Speaker

Jim Heid, FASLA – Founder, UrbanGreen® San Francisco

Jim is a strategic real estate advisor and development consultant with a passion for a more sustainable built environment. His pioneering work in sustainable community design began in the mid -1990's as the principal author and instructor for the ULI's courses and publications on Sustainable Community Development. His leadership continues today as a member of ULI's Climate, Land Use and Energy (CLUE) Committee, as a founding member of the Responsible Property Investing Council and expert advisor to the U.K's BioRegional One Planet Living program.
